

IDEAS.

Have a garden.
Have a good garden.
Try cow peas instead of millet.
Millet impoverishes the land and harbors the fly.
Cow peas enrich the land and harbor no insect-pest.
Have a better garden than ever, and be sure the fence is good.

ONE AIM AND PURPOSE.

REV. F. B. MEYER, B. A.

The longer I live and study the effect of sermons and speeches, the more sure I am that it is a profound mistake to introduce too many divergent themes, any one of which is useful and interesting, but none stands out with such marked prominence and distinctness as to arrest the attention of the congregation.

What a contrast there is between the styles of the minister and the barrister! The one will talk about his subject, and say many pretty and edifying things, which sound well and would read well, which are pleasantly conceived and elegantly expressed. He walks about Zion, and goes round above her, telling her towers and considering her palaces, but does not dream of making a break in the walls and carrying it by an assault. The other fixes on some salient point in his brief, which is capable of being driven home, as a wedge to split a tree. However far he may seem from it, he always returns to it at last, and the jury leaves the box with one thought or fact that demands consideration, and becomes the standpoint from which they view the whole case.

Surely the latter is the finer method and the more effective. He is a successful preacher of the highest order who manages to present one great conception before his people, each time he addresses them, so that as they break from the spell of his influence, they may be possessed of one thought, inspired of one motive, and compelled towards one act.

Two of the greatest preachers of modern times, Mr. Spurgeon and Phillips Brooks, though so different in almost every other respect, are alike in this, that the whole sermon would gather round one essential thought which burnt itself into brain and heart. Mr. Spurgeon would show how that one thought looked in the light of each of the doctrines of grace, how it had to do with every possible experience, how it solved every kind of difficulty. As you listened to him, you began to realize the importance of some fragment of truth which you had previously hardly considered. For the moment, it filled the entire horizon of your soul. You ruminated about it, spoke of it, began to find it for yourself everywhere, and felt permanently richer. So with the great Boston preacher. His sermons are delightful models of what each of us should aim at (I will not stand sponsor for all the theology in the presentation of truth. In the first one or two paragraphs, he states the truth which he has discovered in his text, and begins to illustrate it and enforce it by references to that world of men of which he was so accurate an observer. Let it be clearly borne in mind that a redundancy of thought may be a great cause of weakness in a sermon. Everything that detracts from the main end in view should be carefully eschewed and cut out; and the current of thought should be kept within as narrow a channel as possible, that it may flow swiftly, and move the machinery along its banks.—Selected.
